President Donald Trump, asked about the rising death toll in Puerto Rico from the tropical storm, responded with a question of his own. "I hate to tell you," he said Thursday at a White House roundtable on the federal response to the disaster. "You can leave right now. I don't want to put too much responsibility on you, but do you want to come back next week? We'll be in a better mood." "There is so much misery and so much death," Trump said. "I would rather be with the people that are working and working so hard than with the people that are watching. Believe me, they're in hell right now. They're in hell." Advertisement The comment is not unusual, coming from the president. But it may be the first time he's publicly suggested evacuations. Florida has been under a state of emergency since it's been slammed by Hurricane Irma, but no evacuation orders have been issued. Florida Gov. Rick Scott (R) has urged residents to stick it out and said he didn't see a need for mandatory evacuations. "Some people are being stupid, I'm telling you," Scott said. "But I would not evacuate. I would get people out of their homes if they want to go. If you're going to be stupid, be smart." Officials in Texas, Louisiana, Alabama and the Carolinas issued mandatory evacuations in response to the storm. An evacuation was first 2d92ce491b
