In Australia, it seems that there is no specific law that punishes people for lying to government officials. (Example) I think this could be because of two possible reasons: Because the government officials are considered to be the good guys. Lying to the government officials (i.e. lying) is a common practice in the community because it is more important to remain optimistic than to face the truth. I want to know the correct answer, and I would like to know what the appropriate penalty is. A: Not at all. Lying is against any law. An example of this: a lot of people are fined for littering. However, one can lie about being littering, and that doesn't make it a crime. There's also a lot of self-employment fraud, and it's generally seen as a crime because the consequences can be life-destroying, and also because one would be unlikely to be able to get back the money after, say, a job interview. There are some acts that are crimes, but do not include lying (e.g. it's a crime to wear a disguise to commit another crime). But it's not a crime at all to lie to a government official. A: For specific examples of government policies that may require an official to lie to a citizen, the example in the Wikipedia article probably fits: One aspect of the citizenship test is to demonstrate a knowledge of Australian history. In the case of Australian history, knowledge of the British occupation and other colonial policies and practices, including the laws and legislation that have passed during that period, is essential. When asked a question like that, the best response is: Yes, it's illegal, but not for any reason that would apply to this hypothetical case. Then you're in trouble if you fail to answer it honestly. people, our parks and our rec centers are being defiled by a mad man in our government," said Rep. Gail McCann 2d92ce491b
