But while the NTA was softening its image, the Republicans had hardened theirs. In an era of trust-based politics when privacy and personal information have taken on new value as candidates have become more aggressive about gathering voter data, the NTA's past was not seen as a problem by many Republicans and interest groups. "When I joined the State Board of Elections in 1975, there were no rules and regulations," Senate Minority Leader John McKinney said in a 2002 interview with The Times. "The NTA was considered a very respectable organization." As the NTA grew into a national organization and began to lobby federal lawmakers, its profile was boosted by Barry Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign, when Roy Ash, an NTA staffer and then chairman of the Arizona Republican Party, was put in charge of the organization's publicity.
