The AMD A6-9200 APU has been a pretty popular chip for not only due to its low price, but also its very flexible design. Although the mainstream A series of APUs have support for two cores, it appears that the A6-9200 only really sports only one very large core. A comparison with the FX-Series provides an idea of how much of a core the A6-9200 really is. Unfortunately, this APU is very hard to test with since it doesn't have any native PCI-E support. It does support PCI-E expansion cards with one of the two available slots, however, and the best option is to use the adaptor from AMD's 4-Way CrossFireX power supply. The A6-9200 is a really unique APU. Although the FX-Series APUs are meant to be the main feature of AMD's lineup, the A-Series APUs are meant to get away from being just a simple and cheap APU. They were made with the budget market in mind, and while they aren't perfect, it's almost a shame to waste this chip. The CPU is a 7th generation CMP-based design. Although the CMP architecture is a rather powerful CPU design, the design has only one HyperThreaded core and a 512 KB L2 cache. Compared to the FX-series APUs, the A6-9200 should be rather weak, especially in single threaded applications. The APU can do rather well in games, but again, most of the A-Series CPUs are quite weak, so the A6-9200 probably isn't a very viable option for a game enthusiast. The memory support is a bit more promising, though. The A6-9200 supports DDR3-1333, DDR3-1866 and DDR3-2133 (maximum 1066 MHz), but unlike the FX-Series APUs, the A6-9200 doesn't support ECC. The CPU architecture is supported by the same Graphics Core Next design that the Bulldozer-series APUs had. The GCN design
