How to kill and restart a job? There are a couple of questions on SO that answer how to stop the running job. How do we do the reverse? A: Generally speaking, the best way to restart a job is to send it a KILL signal. In older versions of bpipe this will work bpipe jobname From bpipe 1.4 onwards, the kill command is -k which will not be successful if the job is currently running (in this case, you have to use the kill -9 variant). Also, in bpipe 1.7 and later, the kill command can be used to restart the job -k bpipe jobname A: Bpipe can be a bit fussy about the way it's killed. This is from the manpage: "In some cases, the KILL signal (usually -9) is sent to a process, and a SHRINK job is instead started. Use --shrink to force the job to be a SHRINK job. Use KILL to force KILL the running job." See the manpage if you want to play around with --shrink and --kill. A: You can also stop/start jobs from within a shell script. From here: `#!/bin/bash jobs=$1 if jobs &>/dev/null; then fstr=kill -0 $jobs &>/dev/null if [ $? -eq 0 ]; then echo`

Worldwide, ethanol is produced, and on a large scale, as the primary liquid fuel in fuel cells, in oleochemical plant operations such as the production of lubricating oil, and in fuel blends for motor vehicles. It is used in a variety of other industries and in numerous consumer products. In the fuel cell industry, for example, ethanol is used as an additive in the proton exchange membrane (PEM) electrolyte, which is typically a perfluorinated polymer (e.g., Nafion®). The proton exchange membrane is a solid material which is typically in the form of a sheet or layer, and usually has an ion-conducting, electrically insulating backbone and side chains. The alcohol is added to the electrolyte as a fuel-reagent mixture. A catalytic fuel cell (e.g., a PEM-based fuel cell) includes a membrane and two electrodes formed on the opposite surfaces of the membrane. The electrodes contain catalysts which react electrochemically with fuel and oxidant to produce electrical energy, usually as an electromotive force (e.m.f.). Because ethanol is more soluble than water in the ion-conducting PEMs, it has a tendency to migrate through the membranes and to concentrate in the membrane layer closest to the electrode, such as the anode. This can lead to
