The instance is a 'virtual' server (as opposed to a 'physical' server, which has its own network interface card, etc.). The thing is, I need to point the domain name'mydomain.com' at my public IP. I don't have a static IP assigned, but I have a static block of IP's that I can assign to it. Is there any way to do this? I've been googling all day, and I can't find anything. A: If you can only get a static IP address it may not be possible (at least not without a router with an altered IP routing table). You could also set up an Amazon VPC with the same static IP block, but that would have the disadvantage of being a private network, which you can't access from the outside. If you need a public interface for the instance, it will have to accept connections from the internet, and since you don't have a static IP it's going to have to accept incoming connections from outside. The easiest way to do that would be to change the instance type to "Classic" and use a NAT instance to NAT the instance's traffic to an instance of another instance type that has a publicly accessible interface. You'd need to keep your instance's IP address fixed. FIFA 14 Offices in Miami Beach Miami Beach is known for its sports, fashion and nightlife. It is among the most popular vacation spots in America.
