Feature March 29, 2015 Millions of bats die when their caves flood and flood. Just as they do. One of the very first photos of a mammal “bat” I ever saw was in my first science class in elementary school. There were a group of us, twelve year old kids, who had just spent a night at the BYU museum on campus, a trip that is one of my favorite memories from my freshman year. The museum is home to a collection of species from the Galapagos Islands. Several of the small fish and birds were labeled as they were collected over the decades by the different “explorers.” The mammal exhibit was in the basement, and we had just exited and were walking to the exit stairs when we saw a large cave, partially obscured by a long table, which had a floor that was covered by a white cloth. The table was lit by
