In Captain America: Civil War, during the battle between Captain America and Iron Man, there are these "walls of shields". I'm not really sure what they are. Are they something that they created? A: As far as I know, they are Iron Man's other defenses and inventions in addition to the ones mentioned in the OP: The centurion shield. The armor and other suits he developed that could withstand Bucky's punches. The anti-grav discs (which I believe the one shown is an anti-grav-disc). The anti-grav harness. All of these are shown at the beginning of the movie. If I recall correctly, Tony has been working on developing his own shield, which may explain why he built the walls of shields - they were used to protect the shield from being hit by enemy missiles. [To the question: "When will the quality of medical care in Germany become good and comparable to the quality of care in countries like the USA?"]. The system of public financing of health care in the USA is paid for by taxes and is universal and free of charge. This type of financing is necessary to achieve good health care results. Despite a high degree of care the system is still criticized because of its high costs, but its acceptance is supported by the majority of the population. The system has three essential elements: insurance, coverage and reimbursement. Reimbursement is of particular importance as it sets an objective standard and ensures access to care. In the USA health care is provided by the government and private insurance companies. The health care system is characterized by several special features such as the payment of physicians by fee for service, independent physician organizations and competition among health care providers. Since the 1970s health care expenditures in the USA have risen from 7% of the gross national product to over 17%, which poses
