@gmail.com (Our Views on Defence News) The 'Operation Sankat Mochan' of 2006 near the border with China, India's first ever military campaign on an enemy nation in its own territory, is now almost a decade old. In the past 10 years, India and China have arguably become a political power couple of the world. Almost all the central government's civilian ministries and commissions are now manned with men and women from the National Security Council. Besides the Indian Army, the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Ministry of Defence, the Indian police forces are also under constant pressure to help implement the policy of non-military solution to all disputes in the border areas. The concept of 'Nation building' is getting accepted almost everywhere on the border. The first and the biggest blow in the war against terror came at the end of 2001 when two high powered motorbikes filled with explosives blew up a Pakistani border post in which nine Indian soldiers and one Border Security Force personnel were killed. This terrorist attack on Indian soil, the first of its kind in the post-Independence era, and was directed at India's civilian administration. In 2004, 2004, a similar incident took place on the Indian side, when a remote controlled bomb exploded inside the Indian territory, killing one person and wounding two. It was after this that the Naxals in Jharkhand, who are well-known for their support for Pakistan's Taliban, attacked the Kolhan police camp. The attack came only weeks after India's defence minister had said in Parliament that the Naxals were the 'biggest threat' to India's security. India's second war with Pakistan had begun when the Kargil conflict broke out in 1999. This was India's response to the infiltrations by Pak army and Pakistani civilians along the Line of Control and the International Border. It was the first war with Pakistan in which no casualties were inflicted on the Indian side. The reason was that the infiltrators were killed by the Indian army as they crossed the Line of Control. The biggest achievement of the Indian Army was to halt the infiltration from the Pakistani side at all cost. The third war had begun when in 2001, a mortar shell from across the LOC killed two Indian soldiers. This incident was followed by a severe attack on the Indian Army's battalion base camp at Hiranagar, at the toe of
