A few children have survived and now, when they are grown up, they want to leave this post-apocalyptic place and go to a better place.Q: Change background when displaying message using checkbox in jQuery I am using a checkbox to show/hide a div containing a message. If the checkbox is checked and the message is already displayed, I'd like to change the background color of the message to indicate that it is already displayed. The background color of the message will be saved as an attribute in the message tag. I am trying to avoid using position: absolute and display: none, so I'd like to avoid using the solution described here. How can I accomplish this? A: I would use jQuery like this. I've only used it once in the past, but it seems to have the right functionality. I didn't test this specifically, but it seems like it should work. var $message = $(".message"); $(".checkbox").change(function(){ if($(this).is(":checked")){ $message.css({'background':'yellow'
