The Obama administration is to bar Google from operating its controversial 'Link' search engine in Russia as a condition of the tech giant's acquisition of a company that maintains the service. Washington is concerned that the move will hand Kremlin-backed bots and trolls greater access to the controversial search engine, which it says is biased against the West. The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) ruled in June that Google must reject users in the country, ending a clash between Washington and Moscow over the company's search engine and its "SearchPlus" advertising platform. Google previously allowed both services in the country, but has since moved to block them in Russia as part of the $US8.5billion ($12.4billion) deal. But this week, a source revealed to Bloomberg that the administration is to force the internet giant to implement more stringent technical restrictions on the Russian language version of Google Search. GETTY The FCC ruled in June that Google must reject users in the country The source said: "Google will have to abide by Russian laws. "It means that they will be subject to the same censorship rules that exist in Russia – which is generally not a good thing." they added. Google did not respond to a request for comment. The decision came after US president Barack Obama became angry last year

Franz Boas Franz Boas is regarded as a pioneer of cultural anthropology. Franz Boas—One of the Founders of Cultural Anthropology Franz Boas—one of the founders of cultural anthropology. Born in German in 1858 into a Jewish family, Boas was ordained as a minister of the Reformed Church of America, but he decided to pursue a scientific career. Boas received a Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1884 with a thesis on American Indian languages. In 1899 Boas founded the Department of Anthropology and Ethnology at the University of California, Berkeley. In his seminal book, The Mind of Primitive Man, Boas described the anthropological method of treating indigenous cultures as their own subjects. He continued to explore different aspects of the mind in human cultures with such treatises as The Logic of Primitive Man (1911), published posthumously. In 1905 Boas founded the journal of the American Ethnological Society, which later became the American Journal of Anthropology.
