All I know about virtual method, is, if we have a class A and B, where B is derived from A, then C derived from B, in C we define a method say m(), I know now it can be called from class A and class C. If I define method m() in class A and in the same class I have virtual method, where can I call this method from class A or from class C? Thank you. A: Say you have a class hierarchy class A { void m() { // do something } } class B : A { void m() { // do something else A a = new A(); // anonymous object of type A a.m(); // do something else } } Now for instance, if you have a object of type C that is created from a C# object reference, you can call m(), which will be the m() method defined in class A.
