deep within me. The days are so short and the winter drags on, day after day. I feel it in my bones, deep down, the old seasonal ache that knows a change is coming, even if it doesn't know exactly when or how. So the nights draw in more quickly, and the days linger on, looking like they're already over and done with. No wonder I like the summer so much. I suppose it's only appropriate that the same strong winds that have piled up the snow and frozen the landscape would hinder my progress this year. Most of the snow fell on the area around the tree where I stand now, and the high winds have gone at least a mile and put the tree out of my reach. The ancient stone called the Big Rock is now still and grey. The low sun is no longer golden but a weak orange red, and I've stopped trying to follow the flight of a family of waxwings gathering honey. The light is so low, I can't make out their colouring. I wait and watch, listening to the trees creak as they do. I'm glad I packed my tiny camp stove with tea, hot chocolate, soup and a few other odds and ends, because it's so frustrating to be trapped here, well away from the main road and the source of supplies. I've been reading my book now and then, and have two and a half chapters to go. I'm not in the mood to finish it, though, and I'm not really in the mood to start it, either. I don't know how the story ends, because I don't even know where I'm going. I'm stuck with the words on the page, and no one else to talk to. I was
