I know that sizeof() is usually used in these scenarios: Creating a structure of a certain size Laying out a buffer of a certain size Returning the size of a buffer from a function I was wondering, however, when would you be forced to use some other means, like the sizeof function or %size_t. A: Use sizeof() when it is incorrect not to use it. I do not recommend using it for two reasons. It is always wrong and should be avoided. It only works for pointers to objects, not for all types. I recommend that you use the old style sizeof(foo) form for all types (except for void) and write your own sizeof(T) function. The pointer version of sizeof() (sizeof(pointer)) does not work because it gives wrong results for structs. template size_t sizeof_to_pointer(T* obj) { return sizeof(obj); } size_t sizeof_pointer_to(T obj) { return sizeof(T obj); }
