To evaluate the safety and feasibility of laparoscopic cholecystectomy (LC) in elderly. Elderly patients were assigned to two groups: the standard LC group (Group A) and the mini-LC group (Group B). The data of Group B were retrospectively compared with those of Group A. The total length of surgery, the length of dissection of the extra-hepatic bile duct, and the rate of conversion to open operation, postoperative pancreatic fistula (POPF) and postoperative bile leakage (PL) were compared. Groups A and B consisted of 108 patients and 94 patients, respectively. The length of surgery and the dissection of the extra-hepatic bile duct were significantly shorter in Group B (27.0 +/- 9.0 vs 32.0 +/- 7.0, P = 0.004, and 8.0 +/- 2.0 vs 11.0 +/- 3.0, P 0.05). The incidence of complications in the standard LC group was significantly higher than that in the mini-LC group (P Visualization of active ischemic reperfusion in the rat retina after unilateral common carotid artery occlusion by CODEX.
