As an Arizona native, a place close to the Grand Canyon was right up there. But Hinojosa never dreamed that one of her choices would be a homeless encampment. So when she saw a for-sale sign at a trailer park on the edge of Phoenix, the Atlanta, Georgia, native bought it because it fit the family's budget and offered a nice view. Within weeks, she found she couldn't leave. "It feels like I'm in a zoo," said Hinojosa, 30, as her family drives through the encampment in a gray Ford Taurus with a sunroof, searching for somewhere else to live. "There's men out there on the porch drinking beer and smoking cigarettes and joking around. They play music and they do crazy stuff like paint all over the tires of cars and run up to people." There are more than 300 homeless people living in about 40 mobile homes in this trailer park, which is nestled on the edge of Phoenix in a maze of other parks and trailers, many for sale. Some were here for years before they were displaced. Many homeless people use the encampment as a kind of crash pad, like Hinojosa and her family are. Hinojosa's husband, Brian, 34, said this is the first time he's been homeless. His mother's family bought a trailer park in Florida and lived there for 20 years before they got evicted in 2005, he said. Her sister
