The docs mention something called User object – may be modified by template system. and though I get that a user object does get modified, how is it possible to get a user object in a template? Wouldn't that entail a rendering of the template and a "user object" in a session and then passing that session's data to the template and using that? A: Most template engines are "view functions" and there's no "template object" to render to. What they do is render a template (either from django.template.loader.render_to_string or django.template.Context) and just the content of the context (contains the names of all the objects and variables available to the view). This results in you accessing the context and accessing the user object. One exception is classic django where templates are rendered into strings by the {% render %} tag and the template object (Django's template library) is the resulting string. Also, note that you normally shouldn't need access to the User object from a template. Usually, you want to render a template for a logged in user because of the session security issues. A: The view function has a context dictionary, which the user object is in. This context is passed in to the template to be used with {% %}. Aminoglycoside antibiotics are amongst the most important anti-infective agents available in the therapy of bacterial infections. This highly desirable antibiotic activity is seriously hampered by the well-documented nephrotoxic activity of these drugs. In patients with renal insufficiency, the aminoglycosides accumulate within
