One method for making an object detectable by use of an electromagnetic sensing field is to employ a sensor that monitors a portion of a sensing zone that is greater than the access area of the object, and that uses one or more elements of electromagnetic waves to produce a sensing signal. A problem that can arise when using an electromagnetic sensing field to detect an object is that the sensing signal may be obscured or otherwise interfered with, e.g., by a signal from the object itself. This can interfere with the operation of the sensor since many sensing methods depend upon, for example, the accurate amplification or signal comparison of the detected signals with a known standard. Thus, it would be desirable to provide a method of detecting an object within an area of limited access that reduces the potential for false or spurious detection caused by electromagnetic interference signals produced by the object itself.
