NorthReader reviews & previews NorthReader for Windows NorthReader for Mac NorthReader for Android NorthReader for iOS NorthReader – A Simple RSS Reader for Windows The Biggest problem with the NorthReader for Windows app is that it doesn't actually remember feeds that you import from the web. This means that if you want to use the app, you need to start all over again. If you like the look of the app, however, it is still an excellent choice for browsing through RSS feeds. The interface is very easy to navigate and the app quickly remembers your feeds and re-creates the main page based on what you import from the web. The only downside is that the app has the limitation that you can only share links to text documents using Twitter. If you need to share links to files such as PDF documents or images, you'll need to use a different app for that. What's New In?

NorthReader is a desktop RSS news reader for Windows. A simple and easy-to-use RSS news reader that supports one feed per window. Hotmail was the first free webmail service provided by Microsoft, launched in October 1999. The service was initially only available for the Internet Explorer web browser (later added in other browsers). Microsoft has since added more features in the form of updates, and has begun charging for these updates. As was common with many other clients such as Gmail and Yahoo! Mail, Hotmail was one of the first clients on the web to be accessible via the Internet Explorer's native "Outlook"-style interface. This was the case until January 2006, when the service was renamed Outlook Web Access, though it still used the Hotmail domain. With the discontinuation of the Hotmail domain, support for accessing webmail through the Outlook-style interface was removed, yet some clients (such as Gmail) continued to support it. The Outlook Web App, a successor to OWA, was introduced for Hotmail on April 18, 2017. The ability to run the browser like a fully desktop application has been available to Hotmail users since the early 2000s. Main features Folder structure Hotmail (named Hotmail before relaunching as Outlook) was the first webmail service to provide the ability to add folders to messages. A user can create a new folder, create subfolders within the parent folder, attach any file to a message, and label those messages (without labeling the root folder). By contrast, Gmail provides basic folders called labels. A label is a folder within a folder, and one can create as many as one wants. Labels While Gmail has basic folders, Hotmail has message labels. In modern Hotmail, it is possible to organize a new message into one of three categories. The label title appears above the message: "Personal" "Work" "Updates" Personal The personal label lets the user apply a specific color to the message and archive it for later reference. This feature is similar to the message tagging of Yahoo! Mail. In addition to this, it is possible to choose a subject color for a particular message. Work The work label lets a user apply a different color to each message. In addition to this, it is possible to choose a subject color for a particular message. Updates
