The technology relies on using seawater to capture most of the sulfur dioxide that coal plants release into the air. Without seawater, coal is the most carbon-intensive fuel. Just in time for Earth Day, the Pentagon announced a new push to deploy clean-coal power systems in the developing world. The Defense Department is investing $10 million over the next two years to bolster investments in the technology, which stems sulfur dioxide emissions. Last week, London Mayor Boris Johnson announced that the UK capital would turn off the last of its coal-burning boilers by 2020. The city is not giving up its coal entirely, which it imports to generate power, but it will have reduced its reliance on coal by 90 percent. The plans to shut down the last of the plan—is becoming clear. But the message has already spread: Few European cities are moving to coal, and this summer's climate talks could feature a concerted push to phase out fossil fuels globally. The coal industry—once the backbone of the U.S. economy—is again finding itself the focus of attacks. Coal industry analyst Data2.com (formerly Coal Index) h
