Cables are relational tables containing relationships between crates. They are loaded from JSON files which can be generated by any Cargo importer plugin. The use of Cables, instead of columns or maps, makes it very easy to add new data types without making modifications to Cargo itself. After being part of the Rust ecosystem since its inception, Cables are used in many different projects to represent relationships between other data types. It provides a declarative way to model data with a natural and simple syntax. You can read more about the motivation and benefits of Cables on the project's website. The CrateDB project is a fork of CrateDB, a project started by Chris Dickinson. Cables are now part of the official CrateDB repository, but many crates still rely on the original repositories. This library is a wrapper for the CrateDB Cables API.
