In this section we present tools, utilities, and commands to analyze your source code to make sure it's not doing things you don't want. Generally, the first thing you should do is look for comments in your code. Put code into a comment when it's something you know or are about to find out about: your boss's new guidelines, a code sample, something to a coworker. Don't leave it in the code for the person that's going to maintain it or change it. Comments are good stuff and should remain part of your code. But sometimes you have to write comments because the code really doesn't convey what you wanted it to mean or what the instructions were supposed to do. A good example is when you have to give special consideration to security problems and you need to detail exactly what you're doing and what the problems are. Making Your Code Meaningful This is the first rule of writing comments: comments should tell the reader something about the code they're reading. The problem is that by the time you write your comment, you already know what the code is supposed to do. So instead of making the comment helpful, it ends up being a confession. This particular type of comment is often called a "self-documenting" comment. If you knew enough about the code to write the comment as a normal statement, the code would be self-documenting, and you wouldn't need a comment. But by the time you know enough about the code to know what you're writing about, you're reading the code, not the comment, so the comment itself now has to explain what the code already does. You can minimize the information that you have to include in a self-documenting comment by putting it at the top of the function, and doing your best to write it in the most obvious form possible. You should describe the purpose of the code you're writing at the top of the comment, not at the bottom. As 1d6a3396d6
