After some research, I have seen an emerging theme and would like to share it here. It is that SMA caregivers and the people with SMA are all caring about the same thing, "keeping their loved one's life as full as possible," and then, "being able to "make a living" and "have a life," which they are able to do. The concept of the "complete life" is the same as the "purposeful life." More and more SMA caregivers are observing the trend that "SMA fatigue" of those with SMA is a normal and common human experience, that it's an "experience" that's "shared" with caregivers and friends and family. This is in contrast to what others are saying who are proclaiming that the experience is "horrible" and so they're expecting that a person who's living with SMA will "survive" the disease "by sheer will" and will have to "give up" anything "meaningful" to them. These are the same types of "expectations" that are associated with the stereotypes of "cures" for "crippling" and "incurable" diseases. If the people with SMA can have a life with "complete" SMA experiences, then "staying alive" (instead of "living a life") is a natural human experience that's had by all of us who are "caring" for someone who is "living with" a "crippling"
