his seat and several candelabras fell from their holders. Several candles set fire to the wooden bench on which those who had been on duty had been asleep, and almost instantly the entire building went up in flames. Soldiers tried to put out the fire with buckets of water, but were unable to contain it. After a while the fire went out, but could be seen glowing from a far-off mountain. A grizzled old captain came up to Velyagin and told him that someone had come and reported that he had seen a Vril-ya ship flying in the sky, and that the ship was heading for the large mountain. This had just been reported to the general in charge. The officers of the regiment were asking the general if he needed any assistance. The general said he would stay where he was and not stir until the Vril-ya were landed. He was sure they would be with the regiment before long. The captain asked Velyagin if he could send up all the men to see what was happening on the mountain top. At a distance, Velyagin saw women and children coming down from the mountain peak and crowds gathering from around the village. The Vril-ya ship was flying slowly down to land on the plateau. Velyagin was surprised to see such advanced technology, and was sure that the people who had used it were dangerous. As the people had now all gathered on the ground, Velyagin decided that it was safe enough to leave the decision of what should be done to the people. The captain began to tell the regiment that Velyagin was going to see what was happening, but Velyagin interrupted him and said that he would wait for the men to have something to eat before they climbed the mountain. Velyagin then went to the general, and asked him what he was going to do with the Vril-ya. The general replied that he knew what Velyagin was doing and said that Velyagin could take as many of the Vril-ya as he wanted if he just brought them straight to him. He told Velyagin to bring them into a tent where they could be stored until he decided what he was going to do with them. "What shall we do with them?" he asked Velyagin. "I don't know," said Velyagin. "Who knows?" Velyagin went back to the captain and asked for help in

Efforts to make the Los Angeles Opera self-sustaining were a success, but the company is now in the midst of a period of financial uncertainty, it was revealed Monday. The opera institution, which is in the midst of its 50th anniversary season at Walt Disney Concert Hall, has a current fiscal year budget of $17.1 million, but its endowment alone is $34.9 million, according to a report by the Journal of the American Music and the Arts. It also has long-term debt of $35 million. With the bond offering, which raised $40 million, exhausted, the company decided to slash its expenses in the face of a tight budget year — which began in July — and instead invest its endowment money, made up mostly of $10-million increments from the Walt Disney Concert Hall, to bolster its liquidity. The opera institution, however, remains in great shape, due to the large endowment, and its creditors have not been upset by the company's decision to explore new ways to acquire more money, said Michael Newman, a former conductor of the LA Opera who serves as board president. It is part of a trend among companies to find other ways of raising money, and the company has a representative on the Broad Stage advisory board. Last week, the Los Angeles Philharmonic announced it had acquired the assets of Rialto Pictures, which provided services for film, television, music and theater companies, including the LA Opera. It also signed a $150-million deal to provide services to film, television, commercials, digital and theatrical productions. The LA Philharmonic is poised to become the first non-profit orchestra in Los Angeles to reach $100 million in annual gross revenue. Its endowment has grown from $6 million to $57 million over the past four years. "It is vital that arts companies are very creative and innovative in how they bring in revenue," said Jon Carter, a music consultant who was a producer at Disney Concert Hall. "You have to do more with less." The first hurdle was to find the right strategy, said Newman, the former conductor and now board president. The company decided to "restructure the entire organization and look at things in a more central way," he said. After three months of research and meetings, the company decided to sell its symphony concessions to the LA Philharmonic
