Patients with myelofibrosis (MF) and myeloproliferative neoplasms (MPN) have an increased risk of hematologic malignancies (HM). The risk factors for HM in MF/MPN are poorly defined, and its clinical significance in myelofibrosis and myeloproliferative neoplasms is unknown. We studied a retrospective cohort of 2210 patients with MF and 1392 patients with MPN. HM were defined as myelodysplastic syndromes (MDS) or acute myeloid leukemia (AML), excluding MDS/AML attributable to graft-vs-host disease. The median follow-up was 43 months in patients with MF and 75 months in patients with MPN. Fifty-eight patients in the MF group (2.5% of the cohort) and 18 patients in the MPN group (1.4% of the cohort) developed HM. The incidence of AML and MDS was higher in the MF group, compared with the MPN group. HM were more frequent in patients with prior hydroxyurea treatment. A prior history of splenectomy was associated with a lower risk of AML in patients with MF. In the MPN cohort, prior treatment with prednisone or hydroxyurea was associated with lower risk of AML, and splenectomy was associated with a lower risk of MDS/AML. In multivariable analyses, splenectomy and a prior history of hydroxyurea in patients with MF or a prior history of prednisone or hydroxyurea in patients
