* Replicates Windows' native Command Prompt utility * Lets you customize its interface by choosing your favorite color scheme * Keeps your favorite settings in case you decide to change your computer * Automatically minimizes the window to your system's tray * Offers multiple profile support (Tabs) * You can remove the multiple instances feature before minimizing the application to tray ... an icon script. This feature works by having you drag a script icon from a standard script folder into a custom folder of your own creation, and then having the script launch when you double-click that script icon in the custom folder. In the preview video, I show off the icon script feature in action. I will also show you a couple of additional things you can do with the script. You can find step-by-step instructions to create a script icon If you use the PowerISO (or ISO Recorder) to create or edit an image file for your game, I recommend naming the image file using the filename extension.scr instead of the standard.iso. This is because, as I mentioned in my previous guide to the tutorial, the PowerISO app treats the.scr extension as an icon. You can drag a script icon directly into a folder that exists on the hard drive, but I recommend creating a folder of your own to store the script icons instead of using the standard Scripts folder Creating a script icon When you create a script icon, you can drag an icon from one of the standard script folders into your custom script folder. However, if you already have icons in your custom script folder, such as from the previous guide, you can drag icons from there into the new custom script folder. In the screen shot at the top of this article, I am showing off a script icon I created called grabwithmcp.scr Why not use the standard Scripts folder? Some people prefer using the standard Scripts folder instead of creating a custom folder. One benefit of creating a custom folder is that you can name it any way you like that may better describe the script icon you are creating. However, if you have icons already in your custom script folder, it might not be the best idea to create more. If you create more than one script icon, the PowerISO app will not recognize them as icons (or script icons) and will just treat them as image files. Those are actually two additional things you can do with script icons Drag script
