But not to worry, the holidays are just around the corner, as are the three more important days for developers: New Year's Eve, Valentine's Day, and International Women's Day. Developers, including you, are the ones who keep our world ticking. Now, consider this: with the upcoming holiday season, you are about to hit the ground running. But do you know the right practices to stay ahead of the curve? This holiday season, we want you to stay on top, so we've put together a guide to ensure that your development season gets off to the right start. Grow your app(s) Many developers spend the end of the year furiously working to finish a variety of tasks before their apps launch at the end of the year. But are you sure you're not burning out? To avoid going into a tail spin, we recommend breaking down your tasks into a realistic schedule that allows you to work smarter, not harder. Some developers set the bar too high and "get by" by working 10 hours a day. This is not only exhausting, but it will also likely lead to mistakes or features that are not up to par. So instead, set yourself up for success by mapping out your tasks into a realistic schedule. Ideally, you should be able to split up your work into four separate buckets: New Features – A list of new features that your user interface should be able to do. Fixes – A list of bugs or issues that need to be addressed in your app. Design – The creation of new visual elements in your app, from color schemes to iconography. Accounts – Creating new accounts or integrating social network accounts into your app. When you set up this type of schedule, it will force you to understand your tasks and complete them in the order that they should be
