States jockey to avoid cutoffs in Medicaid funding Article by: PAUL J. RICHARDS Associated Press March 29, 2014 - 10:08 PM EAST CHICAGO, Ill. - Federal and state Medicaid programs are stepping up efforts to avoid cutoffs in federal funding that could lead to skyrocketing premiums and other medical services for people covered by the government insurance program. The Obama administration on Monday announced it wants to avoid the fiscal cliff by completing work on a replacement for the 2010 health care law. The new law would extend the two-year deadline for the start of benefit changes for the health care law's expansion of Medicaid to June 30, 2016, and would add an additional $5 billion to federal spending for that year. Congress has pushed back the deadline in the past, saying it cannot finish work before then. Appearing at an event in East Chicago, Obama said he was confident Congress would strike a deal to avoid a year-end fiscal cliff of big budget cuts and tax increases that have been set to take effect in mid-January. "There's a good chance that we can work through it," he said. A deal on the federal budget could come as soon as Thursday, when Congress and the White House return to the Capitol to resume work on a solution to the automatic tax hikes and spending cuts set to hit the economy, including the military, on Jan. 1. The cuts and tax hikes were agreed to as part of a deal to lift the $1.2 trillion debt limit. The agreement still needs to be approved by Congress, but Obama said Monday that he has been assured the deal is still on the table. "I was assured yesterday from many different sources that I was assured that I had
