DOKLAKOV. istoria artei romanesti vasile florea pdf downloadQ: The difference between a query and a test in Rspec Given the fact that I have a query which returns the rows I want to test for: it "do_something" do expect(query_data).to eq([1,2,3]) end As I am testing my query for correct results, I need a basic way of testing it. While I could use expect(query_data).to include([1,2,3]), I was wondering what the difference between testing a query like this: it "do_something" do # query expect(query_data).to eq([1,2,3]) end And this: it "do_something" do # test expect(query_data).to include([1,2,3]) end There are some differences in the amount of code required for these two ways of testing queries in Rspec. Is one of them bad or would there be a difference in performance if there is a lot of test methods being run? A: The two approaches are different, but the result is the same. Your query will run, regardless of the test. The only thing that would change is the order of the outputted rows. If you had multiple expectations in your query, then your query would return different output depending on if the expectations were met. So in your query, the first: it "do_something" do # query expect(query_data).to eq([1,2,3]) end might return: 1,2,3 1,2,3 1,2,3 The second: it "
