The T-cell receptor (TCR) transduces signals leading to development of the biological response such as cellular proliferation, cytotoxicity, differentiation, and survival. Signal transduction through the TCR crucially depends on efficient formation of an active signaling complex at the immunological synapse and the ability of the activated signaling complex to be destabilized once the TCR is engaged by antigen. Here, we developed a means of visualizing the temporal dynamics of formation and dissociation of T-cell receptor signalosome from the immunological synapse in vivo. Vav1-deficient T cells demonstrate dramatically reduced TCR signaling as a result of impaired TCR signalosome formation. TCR signalosomes can be stabilized, either by positive or negative regulation of TCR-dependent tyrosine phosphorylation, and this stabilizing activity is quantitatively different for each particular TCR signalosome. The loss of stabilizing activity of TCR signalosomes could be simply mimicked by inactivating signaling molecules in TCR signalosomes. Finally, both stable and unstable TCR signalosome complexes could be preferentially destabilized by addition of an increasing concentration of antigenic peptide. These findings provide important insights for understanding the mechanisms of TCR signal transduction. A paradigm for how the psychological meaning of a situation constrains the flow of motivation. Two main constraints on goal-directed behavior were investigated. The mean level of motivation that people are willing to expend (e.g., work hard, eat healthily) was found to be determined by the psychological meaning they give their situation.
