Because organic nanotubes are chemically stable and relatively easy to synthesize, they hold great promise for future advances in flexible, transparent, and fully solution-processed electronics. To date, nanotube-based photodetectors have been constructed using liquid-phase exfoliated nanotubes. Here, we show a laser-induced polarization-independent nanotube photodetector. In situ, polarized, and depolarized photoluminescence experiments show that C(60) aggregation of exfoliated nanotube films is due to dipole-dipole interactions among C(60) molecules, which provide the surface potential for the electroluminescence. As a result, the photoluminescence spectra of the nanotubes remain the same for both the in- and out-of-plane directions, regardless of the excitation polarization. A steady-state photoluminescence background is observed from the nanotube-encapsulating polymer matrix, which shifts the photoluminescence spectra of the nanotubes only slightly but significantly broadens the photoluminescence spectra. The direction-independent behavior of the photoluminescence spectra allows the fabrication of photodetectors based on anisotropic crystalline organic nanotubes. Thin-film photodetectors constructed from a single nanotube solution casting have a large light-to-dark current ratio ( $>10^5$ ) and a fast response ( $\tau = 0.13$  ms) limited only by the diffusion of the generated electron-hole pairs across the thin film, which is about 10 times faster than the response time of the bulk-phase photodetector ( $\tau = 8.2$  ms).[VIDEO] Nederlander Fights With Phoenix Symphony Nederlander Fights With Phoenix Symphony If you would like to donate to relief efforts or purchase products featured in the below video, click here to buy the Salsa music download, here to buy the Cumbia music download, and here to buy the Bachata music download.
