The present invention relates to a process for the separation of so-called useless gases, such as carbon monoxide, hydrogen, argon, etc. and, more particularly, to a process which involves the destruction of the carbon monoxide to carbon dioxide. Processes are already known for the destruction of carbon monoxide by separating it from carbon dioxide. According to the most widely used process, carbon monoxide is burned with air in an oxygen-containing atmosphere at a temperature above about 1000.degree. C. and the produced carbon dioxide and, possibly, a small amount of hydrogen are separated. Such processes are used in order to convert the carbon monoxide to a mixture of carbon dioxide and hydrogen for the manufacture of acetylene. In this case, acetylene is formed during the so-called thermal cracking of carbon monoxide. Such processes are also used to oxidize carbon monoxide to carbon dioxide by supplying oxygen, as required, to a reaction zone, where the carbon monoxide is contacted with an alkaline compound such as calcium oxide and preferably also with a calcining agent which is inert at the reaction temperature. However, both the burning with air and the use of oxygen in the oxidization with alkaline compounds have certain disadvantages. Thus, air is a relatively expensive oxidant. Furthermore, carbon monoxide is a poison for the catalyst, so that the use of air necessitates the use of a catalyst which is more resistant than catalysts which are poisoned only by carbon monoxide. The reaction at elevated temperatures, for example in excess of 1300.degree. C. is relatively time-consuming. Moreover, the disposal of the carbon dioxide formed requires additional measures. According to another known process, an air-free process for the oxidation of carbon monoxide to carbon

Have you ever wanted to be able to play your favorite songs with your computer keyboard? Instead of jumping from the mouse to the keyboard with music selected, then back to the mouse to play, you can now hit the keyboard to play your favorite song and have the song already finished playing before you press the next key. KEYMACRO makes this a reality. This software allows you to assign a keystroke to play a song or album. You can define the keystroke. The keystroke can be assigned to either the left or right keyboard, depending on your preference. You can even assign a keystroke to reverse the order of play. Once the keystroke is assigned, you can do one of three things: 1. Play a song or album. 2. Play a song or album backwards. 3. Stop playing a song or album. KEYMACRO is a great software for those who like to play music on the computer keyboard.
