The Bush administration has notified more than a half-dozen college campuses that they could lose funding if they continue to allow tuition discounts for students from Iraq and Afghanistan, part of the Bush administration's new policy to crack down on preferential treatment for foreign students. The administration sent letters to 16 universities that it said were violating federal law by offering "preferential treatment" to foreign students. The letters are the first step in a dispute between the administration and the colleges about whether the schools are in fact providing preferential treatment to foreign students. The administration argued that the schools have violated the law by limiting the number of low-income American students allowed to take out loans to attend college in exchange for tuition discounts, known as "federal education assistance programs." "We believe that you are in clear violation of the law," the letter from the Department of Education to Harvard University said. "Based on this determination, we are referring the matter to the Department of Justice for appropriate action." The administration's letters come at a time when the debate over whether to bar the admission of more foreigners is under a media spotlight. House Republicans are considering a bill that would bar new foreign immigrants from being admitted to the United States. And many Americans have been angered by the admissions of foreign students. Several colleges deny their programs give special treatment to foreign students and say that they would not choose to admit foreign students over other American ones. "The policies in question are not directed at any particular group or set of students," the University of Oregon said in a statement responding to the administration's letter. "They do not set aside funds or otherwise prefer the admission of foreign students over domestic students. They merely ensure that qualified U.S. students have first right of admission to the same programs that U.S. students would have in the absence of the programs." Some supporters of stricter limits on foreign immigration argue that admissions of foreigners have led to a decline in the number of American students at some of the country's most prestigious schools. Critics say a decline is not a problem and that the admissions of foreign students represent no significant change in the admissions of American students. The dispute over preferential admissions of foreign students comes as federal spending on education is expected to decline sharply next year, according to federal estimates, in large part because of the federal budget cuts known as the "sequester." The Department of Education plans to cut $6.6 billion in spending over the next two years. The administration has been trying to shut down such programs, known as
