This can lead to acting in ways that increase your risk of making bad choices. Why People Are Always Running Out of Time For example, if you notice a phone conversation run out of time, you're likely to take this as a cue to hang up. On the other hand, you might notice that there's only a couple minutes to do something, and therefore experience an urge to rush to that thing before you run out of time. If you notice these cues about time frequently, it's likely that you're creating mental confusion based on physical cues. Here's how: There are two parts to this: how the body senses time and how the brain interprets the body's signals about time. According to neuroscience, it's the brain that creates the idea of time as we experience it in our daily lives. The body interprets time with the concept of instinctive physical signals. If you notice that you run out of time before you realize it, you're most likely experiencing physical cues from the body. If you notice that you feel like something isn't going to work out in time, this is because you might not be able to control your brain. This confusion of time and mind creates a sense of scarcity that creates a physical craving for more time. It's easy to feel this sensation because we live in a world where anything can be done at anytime. In other words 3e33713323
