The authors present the results of investigation of motor function of the femoral nerve and contraction of its muscle in an experimental compound fracture of the lower extremity. In the process of healing of the fracture the function of the main part of the motor nerve was found to recover only after the conservative therapy has failed and the operation of the fracture closure has been performed. The restoration of the function of the injured nerve can be effected by either endoneural microsurgical or bio-minimal surgery. Just kidding, I'm working on it! I wanted to write this blog post to tell you all that none of the problems I've experienced or issues I've had over the last couple months has nearly been worth the stress it's caused me and the time I've had to spend away from blogging. If you're a business owner I hope you see this and understand how difficult it is to work on a steady basis without the proper rest. I'm more driven to succeed now than I ever was, but now that my stress level is through the roof I find myself thinking a lot of negative things about my business. It's hard to do something positive when you've just had your heart broken. I always say "Yay to Failure" when I'm having a bad day. Why? Because just because it failed doesn't mean you didn't try. I am filled with a new sense of determination. Maybe not the same as before, but better, stronger and a lot more motivated. So until I get back to writing, I'm going to have to bring you a blog post for once. Hopefully it'll be the least stressful one I've ever written. I've just got to find the time to get these things written! Follow by Email About Me I've been a freelance writer since 2004.
