Freelance Game Journalist turned freelance Video Editor turned back to playing games again. Mongoloids versus the Elite. Late last week, I mentioned in an update that I had spoken with the guys at Brews & Review for a bit about doing an “interview” together. Well, after all that waiting, I finally put together a new video game review and “interview” with Co-Founder Ian Rogers. I’ll also note, that we were actually on Skype; I’m not sure how well it worked, but Ian was clearly on a computer and in a different part of the world. I did a lot of giggling and “excited-face-o”ing over that... sounds like it worked well. Anyway, I do want to start off by saying that this was a really fun, interesting, unique interview that focused a bit more on the gaming aspect of the podcast. We might do another interview like this. I’ve also now officially graduated from Creighton University’s School of Journalism. Now that that’s out of the way, I’ll soon begin creating content for The Game Journo Pros, as well as working on some new endeavors in the video game industry.Q: How would I write the code so that it only works when access is allowed? I have made a website using HTML & CSS (did not use any JS). The website works by taking people to another page when they click a link on my homepage. I’m worried that the link in the homepage should only take them to another page if the user has access to do so. Can anyone help me write a piece of code that will check if the user has access or not? Thanks! A: You need to check the user's session on your server. In PHP, that would be $_SESSION. If your hosting service doesn't support sessions or if you have special reasons to use JavaScript for logging in (for example to check if the user is already logged in), have a look at these
