Schwalbe's BIG-FRAME frameset As we reported earlier the frame was designed for both domestic and racing duties. The frame is designed to be very stiff. For example the bottom bracket shell is increased by 6mm, the seat stays are 8mm steeper than a standard frame, and the head tube angle is 53.5° (25° sharper than the standard). The frame is built from Sanderson/Schwalbe 6061 with a drilled and tapped Fox Kashima Fork and Fox Float CTD handlebars. The seat post is a Deda Rake, and the seat is a Body Geometry Slant. Brakes are Shimano 105 with Koolstop levers. Other details included a fully adjustable drive train in the form of a SRAM Apex headset and crankset, SRAM Force discs, and a Selle Royal retrofit crankset. The new frameset was tested in a Swiss Alpine style race this year in California by yours truly, and being from a novice, fell flat on its face, but none the less something we liked very much. The design looks to be a superb choice for the want-a-bike user, and already has a number of different stock and custom options. The total weight is just 350g/dry, so pretty light weight for a cross-country race rig. It's just a pity this bike has already been sold. Q: Choosing 4 samples in a 5-set experiment I was working through a question in a book that has been a source of confusion for me: Six machines have been used to produce parts, but two were defective. You must decide whether to test all the machines again or to attempt to determine the location of the defect. You choose four samples of parts and test to see if one or more of the machines are defective. Of the four samples, you have a 70 percent chance of correctly determining the location of the defect. The location of the defect is correct if, at least, three of your four samples contained defective parts. If you were to assume that all the parts are defective, how many times would you have to test the machines before you are 90 percent confident that you have found the defect? I know that if 3da54e8ca3
