1, 2018 Dear Mr Pondick For many years we have been in touch via my computer files on your website, and you have written to me a few times as well. I feel privileged to be a recipient of your love and attention, and I have no doubt that I am one of many who read you daily because of our interactions. In the last few days I have come to a point where I no longer feel able to read the text on the pages of the IUCN Red List, even though I am still confronted with the reality of extinction of thousands of species, often of animals I know intimately. There are no news stories to distract from the terrible reality of the facts of species extinction. It is all too real for me to bear, and it makes me sad beyond measure. I can't seem to get over it. Then, you emailed me recently about the book I had written. How could I have forgotten such a brilliant compliment? I am a bit shy to mention this, so I will just say it: The Passionate Friends is a beautiful book! It is so beautiful, in fact, that I am afraid I will never be able to read it again. I read it repeatedly and I can barely find the strength to look through the chapters again! It is a bit sad, isn't it? And when I first started reading the book, I wondered how on earth I could ever forget the kind words of a gentleman like you! But then I remembered something: I haven't actually finished the book. I only returned to it today, over a month after I started it. It's not quite finished. And I didn't tell you that. But I do want to finish it, and I have been given the chance to do so, thanks to the kind email I received from you. You said that you loved the book, and that you could not wait to finish it. I was very honoured and flattered. When I finished the book, it wasn't quite the end. I have never had anything to do with a novel before, never written one in my life. So, I was very, very happy that you were so encouraging. I 54b84cb42d
