But others continue to quietly profit. Last week, Ed Chen, founder and chairman of the board of Cheniere Energy, was asked to step down as a member of the president's Export Council, a group that advises the president on global trade policy. Cheniere Energy owns a 600-mile natural gas pipeline that runs from Louisiana to the Texas coast. Cheniere and Cheniere shareholders have donated more than $1.5 million to the Republican National Committee and other Republican candidates over the years, according to an analysis by the Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks money and power in politics. Chen's departure is an example of how the Obama administration has recently stopped some big donors from having easy access to the White House. But the administration's efforts to crack down on big donors, which received extensive media attention last month, is being quietly ignored by many.
