The key combinations you use can be defined, so you don't have to remember them. You can set a key combination to send a e-mail, or create a series of keystrokes to open a program, save a file or run an application. The application also allows you to remap keys. With this free alternative to a mouse and keyboard, you can do more on your PC with the touch of a keystroke. KeyMacro's user interface is simple and intuitive. It doesn't require Windows Aero, though you can use Windows 7 themes and icon sets. The main window contains a list of keyboard shortcuts for the functions you can assign to the Macros. You can assign a single shortcut or several macros to a single key or group of keys. KeyMacro works with all major keyboards and standard USB keyboards. In addition to the keyboard shortcuts, the application can also import a Windows key library. For this, you can create your own custom shortcuts. Macros can also be linked to launchpad (a Windows program that lets you set up shortcuts to the start menu or desktop) or shortcuts to actions within Microsoft Outlook. KeyMacro is designed to allow you to link the keyboard shortcuts to the applications, menu and taskbar. The software also lets you record your actions while you use your keyboard. You can also set it up to automatically record your actions. The software also has a handy quick search feature. You can search for specific terms in a text file, or for a phrase or a whole line. This is particularly useful for using batch commands or creating macros that include spaces. The program will automatically highlight the matches. KeyMacro is similar to Keyboard Tagger. It will throw some kind of exception when the process is 64 bit. You will find a solution in the comments: >> "Desktop Sharing" - I used to use this.
