Although hemodialysis (HD) patients are at high risk of bone disease, they may be under-diagnosed, and osteoporosis, the most important and frequent complication of HD, is often overlooked. Vitamin D deficiency is a common problem among HD patients, and its potential negative impact on bone metabolism and skeletal turnover has been well documented in the literature. We aimed to investigate the frequency of vitamin D deficiency in a group of HD patients and to study whether there is any association between vitamin D deficiency and FGF23 levels, markers of bone metabolism, and history of fractures. This cross-sectional study included 143 chronic HD patients at the Rheumatology Clinic of the Evliya Celebi Education and Research Hospital between June 2011 and March 2012. Vitamin D deficiency was defined as
