Premature eruption is a common problem in the practice of pediatric dentistry. Identification of risk factors for premature eruption is an important step in prevention, with early identification of risk factors leading to early intervention. Rat tooth eruption was studied to establish a model to study mechanisms of premature eruption. To evaluate the rat tooth eruption pattern and determine the most suitable time to harvest the sample. The dental eruption of one-month-old rat was observed after orthodontic tooth movement with nickel titanium wire. The starting point of tooth eruption and the amount of tooth eruption were recorded. Eruption started on the first, second, third or fourth day after starting the experiment and complete eruption was obtained on day seven. The amount of tooth eruption was 3.84 mm (range 1.28 to 6.24 mm) on day one, 6.24 mm (range 6.29 to 6.46 mm) on day two, 7.13 mm (range 7.25 to 7.45 mm) on day three and 7.20 mm (range 7.25 to 7.60 mm) on day four.
