Ghasemi, now a French citizen, has spent more than 1,000 days in custody and has been denied parole multiple times. Now she's waiting for the fifth time, but the judges keep postponing her release. Earlier this week Ghasemi was temporarily granted parole after she won an appeal from her lawyer and appealed to the Higher Court. The court recognized the prisoner's rights to a fair trial and her right to free speech. France has pressed for her release since the sentence was handed down, stating that an "impunity" has been allowed to exist in Iran for too long and that Ghasemi has been "blocked from bringing any legal action against the regime's ruling system" in her country of birth. But the judges are adamant that they need further time to discuss her case. Ghasemi was previously sentenced to 10 years in prison for a performance in 2009 where she sang a song called "Close Your Eyes and Forget Me" on stage in Tehran. She was arrested on September 21, 2015 at her home in Paris, according to her lawyer. The original charge was "spreading propaganda against the system," according to Ms. Ghasemi's lawyer, Narges Mohammadi. The government denies that the singer is being held for any political reasons, insisting it's a trial over an "offense of honor." The rapper-turned-singer has already won a preliminary release on bail of $400,000. But she says she is repeatedly denied parole and has been unable to receive any medical treatment while in custody. Related: What a Syrian Superstar Can Teach You About The Art of Protest A new documentary, "I Am Zohreh," focuses on her plight in prison. As a result of her detention, Ghasemi has had to cancel several European tours and it has led to heart problems. "I'm trapped
