Halloween Halloween is a day of celebration of All Hallow's Eve, celebrated on 31 October in many parts of the world, and 1 November in North America. The holiday, originating in pre-Christian traditions, is recognized as one of the four major Western holidays: Christmas, Easter, and the summer and winter holidays. North American celebration Events such as trick-or-treating and costume parties are typical activities for Halloween. The holiday is also celebrated at a number of private, commercial, and public events. In the United States, Halloween is an official state holiday in Utah and Michigan, and a state observance in Arizona. The holiday is also celebrated in some schools, communities, and households, with many young children going door-to-door asking for candy. Many bars, clubs, and restaurants are decorated for the holiday, and promote events. Candy Candy is a confectionary food item, generally sweet and usually in the form of a ball, bar, slab, ring, or wheel. Candy can be a sweet that is eaten as a snack, a confectionery food item, or a confection that is used as a topping or fillings, as in, for example, a pretzel stick. In the United Kingdom, the term candy is often used to refer to confectionery (sweet) of all kinds. The term is often contrasted with lollies (candy-like confectionery items that are sweet but hard, e.g. sweets, toffees, bubble gum, and hard candies), which do not necessarily have to be sweet. Although candy is a major component of many desserts, it is also popular as a separate dessert item. When sold individually, most candy is called candy by name, not as a generic term. Other products, such as chocolate, are also used to make confectionery. Candy is sometimes confused with chewing gum, but the two terms have distinct meanings. Chewing gum is a food item usually made from gum base and sugar, and may be flavored, which is sold in a stick form. Candy

Extensive neurological examination showed a variety of atypical features including ataxia, sensory loss, a facial palsy, fasciculation, vertical nystagmus, and pathological ocular pursuit. Electrophysiological studies were consistent with a diagnosis of Guillain-Barré syndrome, but the clinical presentation was unusual for this illness in a previously well child. Further research is required to establish the spectrum of presentations of Guillain-Barré syndrome in children.Total hip arthroplasty as an alternative in femoroacetabular impingement. Femoroacetabular impingement (FAI) is a condition associated with high dislocation rates in total hip arthroplasty (THA) in younger individuals. This study reviews clinical outcomes in patients who underwent THA using different surgical techniques for the treatment of FAI in younger patients. Patients who had undergone THA and followed at least 12 months were eligible for inclusion in this study. Demographic data, surgical details, and functional outcomes including Harris hip score and leg- and back-specific scores were assessed. Patients were stratified by surgical approach: acetabular fixation (AF) vs total hip replacement (THR). In addition, a subgroup analysis of the THR cohort was performed with regard to operative indication. Twenty-four patients were included in the study (14 females and 10 males), with an average follow-up of 43.6 months. There was no statistically significant difference in functional outcome scores between the AF and THR cohorts. In the AF group, the highest scores were seen in patients with FAI without labral tear (FAI-NoLab). While the most severe scores (mean 23) were seen in patients with FAI with labral tear (FAI-Lab), mean scores (19.2) in this group were worse than those in the FAI-NoLab group. The results for the THR cohort were consistent with these findings. In patients who underwent total hip arthroplasty as an alternative for the treatment of femoroacetabular impingement, THR was not associated with significant differences in functional outcome scores. However, when using different surgical techniques for FAI-NoLab, THR was associated with the best outcomes. In addition, the results for the THR cohort with regard to functional outcomes were in line with our hypothesis that different indications for THR may lead to varying outcomes. AI
