Planned Parenthood and H&R Block have settled their Supreme Court case over a Texas law that requires them to comply with the state's Medicaid program, also known as "Obamacare." The settlement was first reported by The Texas Tribune. It's unclear how the law is being enforced now that the Supreme Court has ruled that the law is unconstitutional. It is unclear whether federal Medicaid funds will continue to flow to Planned Parenthood. H&R Block, which helped bring the lawsuit, sued the state of Texas over the requirement in 2014. A federal judge had blocked the law last year, but the Supreme Court's recent decision means the law is being re-implemented in Texas. The Supreme Court ruled 5-4 in June that Texas' law was unconstitutional, though the justices agreed on a majority opinion. Justice Samuel Alito wrote the majority opinion, which was joined by Chief Justice John Roberts, Justice Anthony Kennedy, Justices Clarence Thomas, and Neil Gorsuch. That opinion found that the Texas law “impermissibly interferes with the federal government’s exclusive authority to regulate the Medicaid program.” The abortion provider had argued that the law violated its First Amendment rights and that the state was infringing upon their right to free speech 77a5ca646e
