What's New in the?

Raindrop.io is a Chrome extension that lets you organize and share your bookmarks from within the browser. A modern update on a classic While the official release of Google Chrome for the iPad seems all too recent, the very first incarnation of the browser was launched way back in 2008. Therefore, we already had a bit of a head start in gaining experience with Google's most loved browser. This is exactly why Google didn't bother to bring the already rather powerful browser to the iPad version of iOS 9, despite their then-current and still current interest in the tablet. Instead, the browser was left for the desktop version of Chrome OS. We'll just have to do without some of the more recent features of the browser. That's not a big deal, though, as Chrome still presents quite a lot of advantages. Chrome for the iPad is of course the browser as it has been right from the very beginning, meaning it will have access to web pages and their contents even without signing in to Chrome. What it will lack is some more advanced features such as web video streaming and password management. These are simply not supported in the iPad version, a version that comes with limited access to Chrome's features, just to mention a few. The good news is that Chrome for the iPad is still much more useful than the so-called version 2.0 of Chrome on iOS. Why would you want to download and install Chrome for the iPad, anyway? Well, apart from the very first version that was presented, it's also the browser with the most up-to-date features. That's something we now expect from any browser, but it may not be the case on the iPad version. Google Chrome for the iPad does not even support multi-process browsing, so you'll never be able to have Chrome open two tabs and load two different sites in parallel. In this version, the browser is limited to one tab at a time. One of the things that's the same in Chrome for the iPad and Chrome on iOS is the tab management. You can easily switch between them, and can also easily close one or multiple tabs. You can always find a single tab in your task bar by swiping up or down, or right to left in the multi-page view. You can also pin a tab to the top or bottom of your window. A handy feature is the ability to add a bookmarks icon to the location bar. This can be extremely useful if you find yourself on a page, and you need to save it quickly and access it later. You can easily zoom in and out of web pages using the pinch gesture. You can also easily search web pages and open them in new tabs using the search field
