Crack Soundtheory Gullfoss V1.4.1 for Windows.Q: Why does undefined not equal to null in JavaScript? These two snippets run different (in both browsers): var undefined = null; // undefined === null and var undefined = undefined; // undefined!== null A: The value and prototype of an undefined variable will be the global object. If you check using 'typeof' it will be 'object', and you can also check using the 'instanceof' operator it will return 'object'. Objects and functions have a type property. The value of a type property is either null, undefined or an object. The same check for null will return true. When comparing equality, undefined === null returns true and undefined!== null returns false. If an object is not an object, it is returned as the result of the comparison. So undefined === null is false; undefined!== null is true. You can also use the toString() method. An object's toString() method returns a string that represents the object. If you have an object, just use the typeof operator. if(typeof variable === 'object') { // variables are an object } else { // variables are not an object } toString() returns the name of the object (or undefined). You can also use the valueOf() method. The valueOf() method returns the primitive value of the argument, whether that is Number, String, Boolean, or null. Otherwise, just check the variable. if(variable!== null) { // variables are not null } else { // variables are null } And finally, as other answers have pointed out, undefined is not a number. So you can't use parseInt(). You can also do: var n = parseInt(variable, 10); A: undefined is an object null is null JSON is same, so the same goes on the same. 1cb139a0ed
