Google Fiber announced Tuesday that the groundbreaking project to bring the fastest internet to the city will begin later next week. The company will be installing infrastructure in Austin's Domain Park, a small business park off East 45th Street that will be a test bed for Google Fiber. During a special Google Fiber town hall meeting Tuesday night, city of Austin staffers gave close to 15,000 randomly-selected people who live and/or work in Austin a packet with a form to apply to be part of the Internet fast lane. A Google Fiber representative said the interactive Q&A made it clear that Austin is "very interested in Google Fiber." "It's the first time we've done this with a project on this scale," he said. The majority of people who applied or are interested will be notified within the next two weeks of their eligibility for the project. The company anticipates that a large proportion of people applying will accept the invitation to be
