Related news There is a feeling of weary anticipation among Windows Update junkies. We're about to find out what is up with that "Migration" button - Windows 10 has only been out for a month - and that is a lot of time for a new OS to really take hold, but Microsoft knows this and is busy preparing Windows 10 for the expected "migration" to Windows 10 that will take place in April 2018. Microsoft is also counting on Windows 10 S to lure customers in from the Chrome OS and Android, and it is no surprise to see the companies working together on this. However, according to information published today, the two companies also worked together on Windows RT, which was Microsoft's OS for x86 tablets that debuted in 2012. "So far, it seems Google is not planning to make any major changes, apart from improving overall user experience. The new update will include a night mode for the browser with dark pages and a new picture-in-picture mode that lets users see their social media posts while still seeing a webpage they're browsing," one of the sources claims. This week Google's Chromium team published a milestone release for the development of the next version of the Chrome browser and we have information from the Chromium Project's blog about the release, its goals and its future development plans. Fingerprint readers have been around for a long time, and now we are going to see biometric readers integrated in devices for the first time. I use my fingerprints to lock my phone and Apple Watch and as a means of identification on the Internet. As the Internet continues to grow and change, we're starting to see more opportunities to help people find their way to new information. This is why Google is launching the Wayback Machine in Search this week, as part of our ongoing commitment to help people find the right information. The Kaspersky anti-virus is one of the most famous around, and for good
