A class is a type that "represents a set of data members and operations on those members" (according to Wikipedia). A struct is a type that "is a value-type with encapsulated storage and a type definition." A class is sort of like an abstract type that can be instantiated. A struct is a value-type that is meant to contain a value of that type. So my question is, when should I use struct, and when should I use class? A: A class is a type that "represents a set of data members and operations on those members" (according to Wikipedia). Basically, a class is a struct that wraps another struct. The main difference between a class and a struct is the interface that the class provides. A class is a type that provides an interface, whereas a struct is a value-type that only provides encapsulated storage. Another way of looking at it is that a class provides an interface, a struct provides a struct. But the main difference is not the interface, the main difference is the type of object that it holds. A struct cannot hold any instances of the struct type, but a class can. (This is not a fact of the language, this is how.NET, Java, and other object-oriented languages work.) A: A class is a group of members that can exist together. Structs are basically single values, which means that you cannot create instances of a struct type. I could make a struct named Car but I cannot make a Car instance. A: Well, according to Wikipedia: Unlike a class, a struct is a value type and cannot contain methods or properties. A class is a way to associate data members, methods and properties. For example, if I want to make a struct, I would make the constructor private: struct MyPerson{ public 3e33713323
